

The Light in the Sky

Sydney

One day, long ago in 1000BC in Egypt stood a man named Thesis. He was the most handsome man with gold-flecked skin, and black hair as shiny as glass. He was standing on a rock surrounded by water. He jumped and hopped until the rock was completely flat, almost covering all horizons. He coughed and hacked and created three other gods. Sunny, the god of sun, Emu, the god of animals, and Xena, the god of rain.

The three gods followed Thesis' orders constantly. If Thesis wanted to, he could kill anyone of them in a split second. All the gods created people to live on the land. Every morning Sunny would rise into the sky and shine as brightly as he could for the people to see. Every night Sunny would sink into the ground and wait for the next morning. But at night nothing would shine or sparkle. Nobody could see anything. It was pitch black.

One afternoon every god was working hard when Thesis ordered everyone to change the job they did. He had decided they had been doing the same jobs for long enough and he wanted a change. So he instructed them to change. Sunny became the god of the animals, Emu became god of rain and Xena to be the god of sun. All the gods complained about this order change, but Thesis would not permanently his mind.

The gods decided to destroy Thesis, and for good. Emu, Sunny, and Xena snuck up on Thesis late at night so he would not have any idea they were there. They chopped him up into millions of little pieces and threw them into the sky. The millions of pieces all shined and sparkled in the night sky, bringing in a faint, dull colour to the terrain.

Since Thesis was the biggest god ever, he shone very brightly by his special powers. This is what the other gods thought. Every night Thesis shone super brightly bringing a fair amount of light to the dark lands of Egypt. Everyone was super happy. Thesis was gone so everyone could return to their regular jobs. Plus the Egyptians could see more clearly at night.

Sunny, Emu, And Xena used their supernatural powers to populate the world. All three gods also created other gods to help them rule Egypt. All gods had their own job to do. Egypt became a populated country with heaps of citizens. Still, every morning Sunny would ascend and make the day bright and then when Sunny had set Thesis would gleam ever so faintly, however still bringing in a little radiance for the Egyptians so very far below.
